GARO HILLS SUCCESS STORY

Villagers with Chengga Juice bottles, Picture by Saidul Khan

A juice brand to call its own

SAIDULKHAN

Tura, Nov. 18: A remote village in Meghalaya's West Garo Hills has cashed in on the rich fruit diversity to produce juice under its own brand "Chengga".

The different varieties of seasonal fruits and wild berries are being used to produce juices which have become a popular brand in different markets of Garo hills.

The villagers of Rangmanagre, under Gamboge development block, conceptualised the idea of producing juices in 2010.

The village, about 50km from Tura, along India-Bangladesh border has 55 households. It is a project village under DoNER ministry's North Eastern Region Community Resource Management Project (NERCORMP) for upland areas.

The lead for production of juice was taken up by Rozillar M. Marak, a member of Natural Resource Management Group (NaRM-G), during its group meeting.

The NaRM-G is a group of villagers formed under the project. "We have vast areas under orange and pineapple cultivation. We felt that if we could start processing juices, it will be viable and mooted the idea to NERCORMP. They provided us technical assistance and we started the juice-processing unit," Marak said. It is a small unit run by NaRM-G and a women self-help group in the village. The unit produces about 1,500 litres of juice every month.

"In different seasons, we produce different varieties. The juices are made from available fruits in the village. We also produce juices from wild berries like mulberries," he added. He explained that juice of Indian gooseberry is a hot favourite in the market as it has medicinal value. "Over the years, we have been able to reach out to almost all markets of Garo hills," he said.

The NaRM-G of Rangmanagre manages a sustained income by selling the juices in the local market. A 500 ml bottle of juice is priced at Rs 100.

Though the management of the juice production is handled by NaRM-G, the women self-help group makes extra income by selling the juice. "We get Rs 20 as commission for sale of each bottle," said a member of group.

The juice-processing unit has given the villagers a reason to smile. Their brand is also being promoted and marketed by NERCORMP as "NeatChengga Juice", which is now supplied beyond Garo hills.

"We are helping the villagers to market their produce in various exhibitions and through NERCORMP brand. We are also assisting the NaRM-G to ensure that the juice produced are of good quality and processed in hygienic environment," said Jennifer Khumlo, an official associated with NERCORMP.
